Ramapo College of New Jersey officials are continuing to actively monitor the outbreak of H1N1 flu (Swine Flu) that has sickened people throughout the world.

There have been 5 cases of influenza like illness on campus. Four of the individuals have recovered and returned to classes. Currently there is only one commuter student with a recent diagnosis who remains at home.

The Federal government and the World Health Organization (WHO) have declared a public health emergency as a result of the H1N1 influenza. Ramapo College has had no confirmed cases on our campus. The first positive cases of H1N1 influenza in New Jersey were announced by state health officials on April 30, 2009.

The College's medical and environmental health staffs have been in communication with the New Jersey local and state public health officials and continue to respond to direction provided by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC.)

The American College Health Association is monitoring the status of Influenza Like Illness (ILI) in college students across the United States. As of October 16, 2009, participating schools have reported 7,099 new cases of ILI among college populations which total over 3.4 million people. Ninety-five percent of the 278 colleges and universities reported new ILI cases, compared to 92% reporting new cases the prior week. The nationwide rate was 20.9 cases per 10,000 students, nine percent higher than the prior week's rate.

Except for a few states with reported increases, regional outbreaks of ILI seem to have already peaked in the Southeast and Northeast. The Mid-Atlantic region has seen a slight increase in activity since the previous week. The Midwest, Rocky Mountain area and Southwest are experiencing continued robust activity. Again, no deaths have been observed in the reporting institutions for the weekly period of October 10-16.

This website will provide up to date information about H1N1 influenza and describes the College's preparedness efforts and responses to this evolving public health incident. We will continue to update this information to reflect new developments affecting our community.

The College will continue to update members of our community with pertinent information about H1N1 influenza as needed.
